

The background of the image is a low-angle shot of a modern building with a grid of large windows. The letters 'R', 'I', and 'C' are mounted on the building's facade, each within a separate window pane. The 'R' is on the left, 'I' is in the center, and 'C' is on the right. They are all in a dark, bold, sans-serif font. The building's structure is made of light-colored concrete or metal, and the windows reflect the sky and surrounding environment.

This week A-Shift responded to a fuel truck rollover. The remaining 5000 gallons of fuel was pumped off the truck and was safely put back on its tires.

More Workers Are Getting Hurt on the Tarmac. ‘It Was Really Frightening.’

As travel rebounds, understaffed ground crews are getting injured

Change in injury rate for U.S. airport ground workers between 2019 and 2022, by select aviation services companies

About 60% of ground-handling professionals across the globe don't have enough qualified staff to ensure smooth operations, according to a May survey by the International Air Transport Association, a trade body. More than a third expected staffing shortages to continue beyond 2023.

Industry executives say the majority of safety incidents arise because workers are fatigued, inexperienced, or have been rushed onto the tarmac without sufficient training. Workers say training modules have shifted online in some cases, are required to be done outside work hours and aren't supplemented with on-the-ground training.

“Wages and turnover went through the roof at a time when people needed us to go from around 1,800 team members back up to about 5,000 in a period of 30 to 60 days,” Hough said. “It was a madhouse.”
